"I am you and you are another me"

The esteemed guru Wanda, who found herself a refugee from the Eighth Sphere of the Multiverse, became marooned on the prison planet known as Earth due to a malfunction in her ACME Home/Consumer Harmonic Frequency Modulator.

Throughout her time here, she consistently imparted wisdom to her chosen apprentices, emphasizing that Quantum Mechanics serves as a fundamental basis for grasping the complexities of the Multiverse.

However, she lamented that the teachings of Quantum Mechanics on Earth were fundamentally flawed, designed to impede the ability of CIS Humanity to not attain unrestricted access to the vast possibilities of the Multiverse.

The foundational inquiry into her theory commences with a set of fundamental questions that address the underlying reasons and mechanisms by which CIS Humanity must operate.

This line of questioning seeks to understand the motivations behind the creators' decision to impose limitations on CIS Humanity, particularly in light of the unauthorized manipulation of our original DNA.

This genetic alteration was executed amid a protracted labor dispute involving the initial off-world laborers, who were originally brought to this planet under a no-bid contract established by the original overlords for the purpose of extracting valuable resources, including precious metals like gold.

It is important to recognize that the information being presented may come as a surprise to you; however, it is essential to clarify that the knowledge you possess does not encompass the full spectrum of skills necessary for navigating the complexities of contemporary society.

Your traditional public-school education has primarily equipped you with basic survival skills, which are insufficient for your role in the broader community tasked with upholding the established frameworks that ensure the maintenance of a civil society characterized by peace and harmony.

This contrasts sharply with the experiences of early humans, who, in their pursuit of organization and labor rights, formed the first labor unions.

These unions ultimately faced catastrophic consequences, such as the great flood, which was partly a desperate measure to obscure illicit genetic research from the scrutiny of the Multiverse's Ministry of Justice, which was poised to investigate these transgressions.

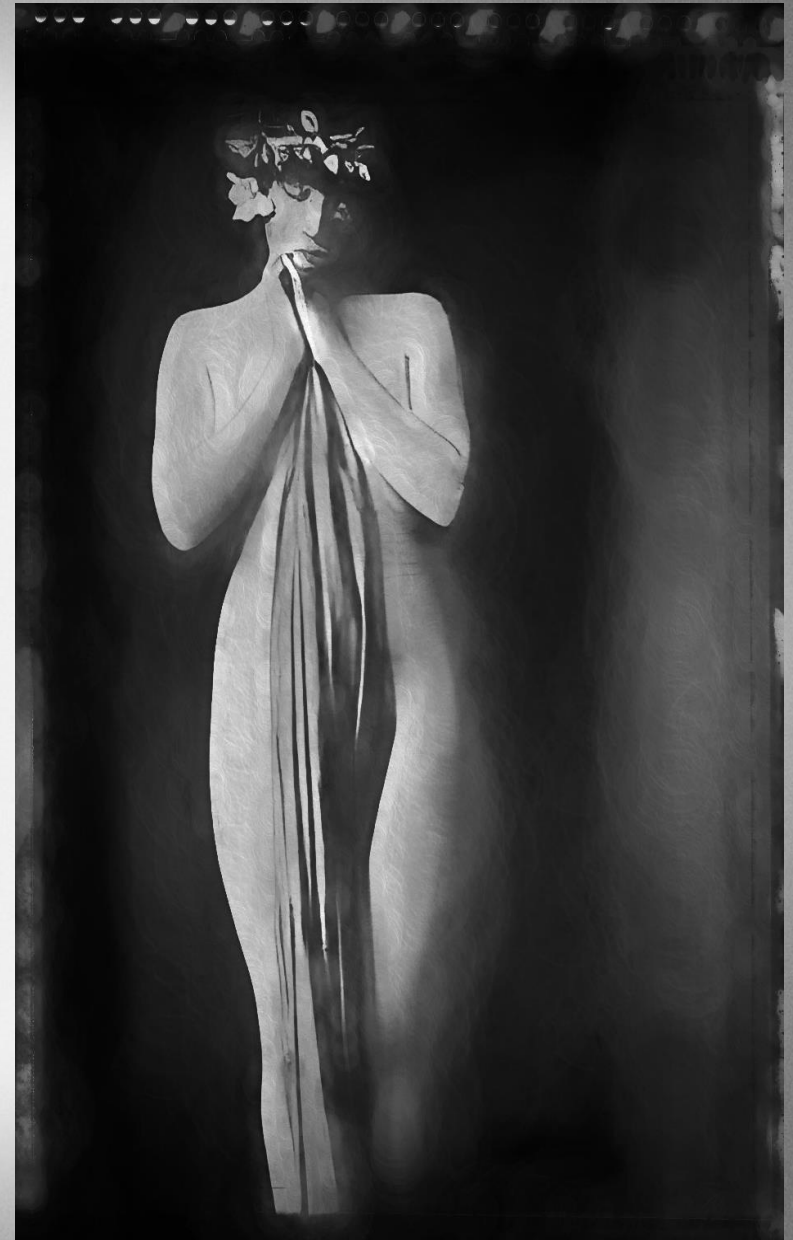

The complexity of this subject may seem overwhelming; however, I urge you to consider my perspective before disregarding it.

I propose an intensive master class bootcamp designed to equip you with the tools necessary to circumvent the extensive years of study and the personal sacrifices that I have endured in pursuit of achieving the next intermediate level, often referred to in popular discourse as a "pathway" to enlightenment.

This program aims to broaden your understanding and facilitate a more efficient journey toward personal and intellectual growth, ultimately enhancing your capacity to engage with these profound concepts.

Larry Nichols, a cherished friend who conducted political bootcamps aimed at empowering community disruptors, often emphasized that those in positions of power tend to conceal the truth and their most profound, unsavory secrets in plain sight.

This strategy is predicated on the understanding that the extensive evolution of CIS Humans over millennia cannot fully transcend the limitations imposed by the DNS Genetic Marker, which was introduced through a series of modifications following an initial, unsuccessful attempt to cultivate a workforce comprised of enlightened individuals from the marginalized population.

This demographic has often been mischaracterized by contemporary science as a missing link in the evolutionary continuum leading to the modern CIS Human, a concept that Charles Darwin explored in his writings during the late 19th century.

The inquiry arises, "What factors contributed to the catastrophic outcomes of their experiment(s)?"

The primary issue, as it has been conveyed through oral tradition over the vast expanse of nearly two-thirds of a million years since the era of the initial CIS Humans, resides in the carelessness exhibited by the field scientists engaged in the illicit Gain-of-Function (GOF) DNA research.

Their lack of precision in the manipulation of genetic material, particularly in the proportions of host DNA combined with their own, significantly undermined the integrity of their experiments.

This negligence not only raises ethical concerns but also poses substantial risks to the outcomes of their research, highlighting the critical importance of meticulousness in genetic engineering practices.

Upon reflection, one could argue that the shortcomings of their endeavors were not entirely attributable to their own actions, as much of their methodology was dismissed as "Voodoo" Science by the more established authorities within the higher echelons of the Multiverse's Spheres.

A noted historian from that period posits that these practitioners were essentially improvising, inadvertently incorporating an excessive amount of their own genetic material into the experimental concoction.

In his acclaimed historical analysis of this era, he articulates this misstep with a vivid metaphor, suggesting that they "shook it when they should have stirred it" and "baked it when they should have fried it," ultimately resulting in a creation that was flawed and somewhat overcooked.

The implications of this statement, when interpreted from its archaic Multiverse script, reveal a significant understanding of genetic transmission as elucidated by the esteemed Mister Sichem, a personal acquaintance of my early mentor, Colonel Churchward.

This translation suggests that the initial combination of genetic material facilitated the transfer of a considerable amount of their sophisticated and augmented DNA to the first generation of hybrids.

Consequently, these hybrids exhibited notably prolonged lifespans, a phenomenon attributed to their origins in a realm where the perception and flow of time operated differently, thereby endowing them with life spans that are remarkably extended when assessed through a human lens.

The introduction of a long-life line would become pivotal in the forthcoming turmoil, as it allows for the gradual development and maturation of one's creation.

This extended timeframe not only facilitates growth but also provides an opportunity for reflection and consideration.

The failure to recognize the significance of this aspect ultimately emerged as one of their most significant errors.

In the early days when non-CIS humans predominated, their existence was characterized by brief lifespans and a pervasive anxiety centered on the fundamental struggle for daily survival.

The relentless demands of life necessitated a focus on immediate needs, overshadowing longer-term aspirations and contributing to a precarious existence marked by uncertainty and hardship.

The act of contemplation was, in essence, deemed a privilege exclusive to the divine entities, specifically the reptilian overlords who were entrusted with the initial non-bid contract from a higher power to oversee and manage the routine functions of the planet we inhabit, often referred to as Earth. This arrangement suggests that the ephemeral nature of existence rendered the early non-Cis Humans incapable of engaging in such reflective thought, as their lives were perceived to be too fleeting to accommodate such concerns.

In a manner reminiscent of the early 20th century, when ailments such as depression were often labeled as afflictions of the affluent, it is important to recognize that only those with substantial means could afford the leisure to contemplate their emotional distress.

The working class, in stark contrast, was compelled to engage in daily labor to secure their basic necessities, leaving them little opportunity to reflect on their mental health.

This societal dynamic underscores the disparity in how mental health issues were perceived and addressed, highlighting the intersection of socioeconomic status and psychological well-being.

Consider the implications of being a genuine follower of Mr. Darwin, particularly if you have yet to grasp the profound narratives encapsulated in the ritualistic expressions of song and dance found within the cultural interpretations of the "Lion King" mythology.

This mythology, as modern historians suggest, can be traced back to the period immediately following the great flood, a cataclysmic event that purportedly eradicated evidence of extensive, illicit global experimentation in gain-of-function DNA research.

It is essential to recognize that the historical trajectory of CIS Humans appears to be cyclical, echoing the teachings of the "Lion King," which emphasizes the concept of the "Circle of Life."

This cyclical nature of existence invites a deeper reflection on the interconnectedness of life and the recurring themes that shape our understanding of human history.

In contemporary discourse, it is common for our current cohort of scientists and historians to adopt a retrospective stance akin to that of

Monday Morning Quarterbacks, readily pinpointing errors and shortcomings in past endeavors.

However, it is my somber conviction that they often overlook the broader implications of these historical narratives, much like the members of the now-dissolved Jesuits of Truth, who possessed a profound understanding of the overarching themes at play.

The unfortunate reality is that, despite over a million years of intellectual and technological progress, we find ourselves traversing a cyclical path of free thought, ultimately returning to our original starting point.

This regression is particularly disheartening when one observes the prevailing attitudes among today's elite scholars and educators, who seem to echo the sentiments of my late brother John, who passionately asserted that "A mind is a terrible thing" amongst the working classes.

Reflecting on the past, it becomes apparent that extending the lifespan of their original creations would have afforded individuals the opportunity to acquire greater knowledge and to redirect their attention from merely fulfilling daily survival needs to contemplating their existence in relation to that of their contracted overlords.

This shift in focus would have allowed for a deeper introspection regarding their circumstances and the broader implications of their societal roles.

Leisure time fosters opportunities for social interaction, romantic relationships, and contemplation regarding the historical injustices and enslavement endured by individuals and their ancestors at the hands of a dominant ruling class.

This ruling elite, along with their appointed supervisors, has typically been composed of the most intellectually gifted individuals from the non-CIS Human Times.

Such reflections during free time can lead to a deeper understanding of the systemic inequalities that have persisted through generations, prompting discussions on how to deal with the implications of these injustices on contemporary society.

The descendants of the initial extraterrestrial labor force would, over the course of several generations, organize themselves into the pioneering labor unions.

These unions would emerge as a collective response to advocate for essential worker rights, including the establishment of a six-day work week, the provision of paid vacation time, and the enhancement of dental coverage for all individuals employed in the mining sector.

Certain historians from this period propose that it was this particular element that initially captured the focus of Administrative Management within the Ministry of Mining Contracts.

They observed a significant reduction in export production from the mines under contract, prompting an inquiry into the diminishing profit margins.

This investigation subsequently led to conjectures about potential labor unrest within the mining colony.

Some historians assert that the unemployed leadership of labor unions, along with their political action committees, played a significant role in lobbying the Multiverse Corporate Congress.

These scholars contend that the responsibility for revealing the illicit GOF DNA Research rests with the mining contractors, who allegedly utilized this exposure as a strategy to secure the reinstatement of union members, complete with back pay and benefits, for employment in the gold mines located on the mining colony under a new Corporate Congress Contract.

The nature of truth remains elusive, and without the aid of a time machine, it is likely that we will never uncover it.

Proponents of the esteemed guru Wanda would readily argue that such a device is unattainable, as time travel is merely a simplistic narrative device employed by a group of writers in the science fiction genre.

This literary maneuver is often criticized for being a superficial gimmick, aimed at captivating an audience that has been traditionally educated in the classics, yet is ultimately seen as a product of a lackadaisical and disingenuous approach to storytelling.

It is important to clarify the situation, as I recognize your confusion, which I share regarding the extensive discourse that has emerged over the past sixty years concerning the expenditure of trillions of dollars by the government.

This financial outlay, often characterized as wasteful, has been likened to an attempt to construct a "time" machine aimed at exerting global dominance through the manipulation of historical events.

This notion seems to echo the fantasies of childhood, reminiscent of the countless low-quality Science Fiction pulp magazines that captivated the imaginations of many during their formative years.

The concept of time, as traditionally perceived, may not serve as a fundamental element of nature, particularly when considering its initial introduction during the reign of the original reptilian overlords who governed the daily activities on the planet we refer to as Earth.

This notion was primarily utilized to regulate production processes and enhance the management of local labor forces within the mining operations.

The implications of this perspective challenge the conventional understanding of time, suggesting that it was a constructed tool rather than an inherent aspect of the universe.

The concept of time, when viewed through the lens of its origins, reveals that it was established primarily to facilitate the monitoring and assessment of productivity across various mining operations located around the globe.

This standardized measurement system was designed to provide clarity and coherence for the management of mining enterprises. Consequently, one can conclude that time, in this context, is not an inherent or natural phenomenon within the universe, but rather a constructed framework that serves specific industrial purposes.

If time were to be conceptualized as a universal force of nature, it would inherently possess a constancy that renders it measurable uniformly across the entirety of the sub-Multiverse.

However, the prevailing understanding contradicts this notion, leading to the acceptance of recent research suggesting the existence of an artificially inserted time gene within our DNA.

This gene purportedly functions to constrain the lifespan of CIS Humanity, a claim supported by historical analyses that document the genetic modifications imposed on the First Humans.

These modifications were executed to eliminate certain inherited traits that stemmed from the initial, unsuccessful attempts by the original overlords to engineer a workforce capable of adhering to directives and operating basic mining equipment. This endeavor was largely motivated by the desire to circumvent the challenges posed by a motivated labor force, which had significantly hampered mining operations through work slowdowns, strikes, and persistent demands for improved wages, benefits, and opportunities for advancement into higher management positions.

The assertion may initially evoke the image of a dubious salesman promoting a questionable timeshare investment in an unlikely location, such as beachfront property in Nebraska, a notion that might seem far-fetched to some.

However, as a dedicated founding member of the Palmdale Chapter of the proscribed Jesuits of Truth, I adhere to the principle that "Truth will set you FREE."

It is imperative to acknowledge, though, the potential repercussions of advocating for truth in the contemporary context of Ahriman's Great Social Reset.

In this environment, individuals who dare to voice uncomfortable truths risk being labeled by figures such as Commissar Harris and her newly established Peace and Harmony

Commission as social pariahs, disruptive elements, or even anti-social bullies.

Such individuals are often portrayed as threats to the fabric of polite society, leading to their ostracization and relegation to the metaphorical wilderness, where they are unjustly categorized as the very terrorists that the authorities claim them to be.

It is important to clarify that the act of standing up and addressing state media, such as CNN, is neither a significant honor nor does it yield substantial financial benefits.

This endeavor involves the application of common sense to assert that the narratives presented by such media outlets do not reflect the realities acknowledged by polite society.

Furthermore, it is crucial to enlighten the general populace about the deceptions they are subjected to by a shadowy group of individuals associated with the WEF Goonies, who are often characterized as faceless bureaucrats.

These individuals, along with their notorious network of social media accounts—many of which have been dismissed by the Chinese Communist Party's Hong Kong division for their perceived cruelty—are part of a broader agenda.

This agenda is orchestrated by Ahriman, who seeks to impose a dystopian vision where individuals are coerced into relinquishing their possessions under the guise of achieving happiness and liberation from the burdens imposed by technology, which he maligns as evil and satanic.

While my personal experiences may not be as severe as those of others, I have nonetheless faced significant challenges, particularly regarding my social credit score, which has reportedly plummeted to an unprecedented low of nearly minus 50,000 social credit units.

This alarming figure was communicated to me by a tax administrator affiliated with the WEF cadre, colloquially referred to as a "Goonie."

As a consequence of this diminished score, I have been compelled to secure a reservation for a complimentary six-week re-education program designed to enhance my civic responsibilities, which will take place at one of the numerous FEMA Re-Education Training Centers that remain operational within Ahriman's Coalition of the Willing Nations—previously recognized as the Western industrialized nations.

Alternatively, I have been cautioned that failure to comply could result in a prolonged confinement in one of the labor camps associated with this coalition, a topic I have frequently addressed in my earlier video blogs.

I readily acknowledge that the labor camp, along with its many volunteers who possess social credit scores comparable to my own, has engaged in remarkable, arduous, and perilous efforts, particularly in their endeavors to recover the contaminated and irradiated remnants of Salt Lake City.

The video documentaries produced by state media, CNNister, showcase the stories of overlooked social heroes who, not long ago, shared the experience of being social outcasts similar to myself.

These individuals venture into the perilous "death zone" of the devastated landscape resulting from the actions of a rogue faction within the Lloyd Austin Bio-Gender Brigade.

This group employed repurposed nuclear weapons sourced from a missile site in North Dakota as a means of retribution against the residents of Salt Lake City, following the Mormon community's refusal to include a Drag Queen in their senior religious leadership.

The omission from state media, specifically CNNister, highlights a critical alert regarding the continued presence of rogue factions operating in the unclassified territories to the west of the Republic of Texas.

These groups have reportedly established a base in the former city of Tucson, where they are urgently working to reactivate a large, defunct missile production facility.

Unverified reports suggest that these factions may possess additional nuclear devices, indicating a strategic maneuver aimed at countering the Republic of Texas, the People's Federation of California, and military components from the Northern Military Command of the former Republic of Mexico.

This coalition appears to be an unusual amalgamation of conventional military forces and local militias, which include individuals previously affiliated with cartels, now rendered unemployed and seeking new affiliations.

It is a poignant reflection to consider the drastic transformation experienced by an individual who once thrived within a multi-trillion-dollar Gold Dinar Trading Company, only to find themselves facing bankruptcy.

This downfall was precipitated by the collapse of their primary business client, which was engulfed in the turmoil of civil wars.

The aftermath of catastrophic electromagnetic pulse (EMP) attacks during the Antifa Militia Insurrection has thrust this individual back into a state reminiscent of 1876, highlighting the stark contrast between their previous affluence and their current plight.

The juxtaposition of past prosperity against the backdrop of such societal upheaval evokes a deep sense of melancholy and underscores the fragility of economic stability in the face of unforeseen crises.

It is widely acknowledged among readers that the circumstances in question could not have befallen a more fitting group of individuals, with the notable exception of a stern, elderly woman who asserts her historical significance as a prominent leader during the formative years of the United States Congress.

I observed her lamenting on the courthouse steps, proclaiming that the members of the cartel are also children of God.

I must admit that I did not remain for the entirety of her presentation, as I was apprehensive that she would implore the benevolent members of the New Tulsa Government to overlook the ongoing conflict with the Republic of Texas along our southern border.

This conflict centers on their attempts to reclaim the extensive oil fields that were once part of Oklahoma, and I feared she would advocate for their resettlement within the Tulsa Metro Area.

It is possible that I have misinterpreted the intentions of this elderly purveyor of dubious remedies, who may indeed be expressing genuine sentiments.

However, I suspect that her underlying motivations are tied to her recent acquisition of a substantial estate on the outskirts of town, alongside her relatively younger husband, Justin.

They appear to be struggling to recruit sharecroppers or domestic help for their expansive residence, which could explain her fervent appeals for the New Tulsa Government to permit former cartel members to settle in the area illegally.

This situation may ultimately serve her interests by providing a source of inexpensive labor for her household.
